changes over the last few years and people are saying, well, I'd be willing to look at those policy changes, I get very nervous when those types of discussions are happening, because I was here and remember the fight that we had on that whole issue when it went through. And ever since it went through, the people who didn't win have been trying to get rid of that provision in Nebraska statute. I happen to think it's working very well, regardless of the fact that some of these individuals may have longer sentences imposed. You have to remember that it's the judges, it's their discretion. They're listening to what has actually happened in these cases and if you'll read through these four sample cases, the third one, it says that this gentleman, had we not had that law passed, would have been eligible for parole in five years. And so when you want someone like that, who has done something so heinous, to serve a longer time in prison, and this is an individual that he just hit with his pickup truck, I want someone like that held in prison longer and I'm willing to spend my tax dollars to do it. And if we have to build another prison to have these types of violent individuals in prison for a longer period of time I'm willing to do that. And when I look at these statistics on violent offenses and go down this of why people are admitted to prison, every single one of those offenses look violent to me. As a person who's trying to raise children and in a neighborhood, I look at that and I think arson, drugs, fraud, weapons, sex offenses, restraint, all those things that you're counting in nonviolent or other offenses to me are very violent offenses committed by very violent people who, especially in the drug situation that we're going through, our entire society is changing. You talk to law enforcement and that even mothers are coming into the Health Committee telling us about the impact on their teenagers of drugs across the state of Nebraska, and if we have to throw some of these people in prison for a longer length of time I'm willing to do that and I'm sure that the people who heard me talk like this and reelected me to be here are also willing to spend their tax dollars to keep these types of individuals in prison for definitely longer than five years after they run somebody down and kill them. I don't think that's a long enough time to keep someone. So when you're talking about changing policy it sounds like rhetoric that, to me, makes me very nervous about changing the policy. If you'll look this year, Senator Chambers, one of these people who want
